MARKING HOUSE HOLD LINES

The woman who likes needlework enjoys marking her own household linen. The day has gone by when the young engaged girl spent hours and hours working over fine lingerie. For a little price the shops now sell beautiful lingerie that is made with more style and smartness than any girl could make herself. The bountiful trousseau is now longer the order of the day, so it is foolish for the engaged girl to spend days working over fine frocks and shirtings.

But there is no law against a plentiful supply of well marked household linen. To be sure, there are changing styles, today, even in table cloths and pillow cases; but the girl who likes to use a needle and who wants to feel that she is contributing something toward the charm of her new home can mark and embroider all the linen she has time for and is fortunate enough to possess without hesitating to accumulate too big a supply.

A certain simplicity characterizes the lettering of the finest household linen. Monograms are in good taste, but they must lack ornateness. The three letters—sometimes only two—are used—are joined together very simply. Often the letters touch each other only at one point.

Plain script, worked in satin stitch, is in greater favor than any other sort of lettering, and really seems more in keeping with fine damask and other table linen. Block letters are also used a good deal, and two or three of them, formed into a simple monogram, are very effective.

Everything is marked nowadays. All towels are lettered. The hand towels are embroidered with more or less elaborateness. On guest towels two inch letters are embroidered to match the other embroidery. On larger towels three inch letters are, in good taste.

Turkish towels are all lettered now. Some of them have the monogram or initial woven with the fabric. In others the initials are embroidered, in color on a small circle of linen. This is inset in one end of the towel. Still others are marked in cross-stitch or big French knots in colored cotton. Face cloths are embroidered to match the towels. Those made of crash are embroidered like the bath towels, others like the hand towels.

There is no essential difference in the lettering that marks table linen and household linen, excepting in the size of the letters and the quality of embroidery cotton used. The larger articles naturally are marked with larger letters. Four-inch letters can be used on sheets and table cloths. On napkins the letters vary from an inch to 2-1/2 inches, according to the size of the napkins.
